LAW IN VERSE. A Specimen of Poetical Reporting From

American Law Record. The following appears as a foot-note t the case of State vs. Lewis, reported in 19 that the defendant Lewis, imprisoned in the common jail on a charge of burglary while awaiting his trial, broke jail and ea caped. He was afterward arrested on a warrant for breaking jail, waived examination and was again committed. After his charge of burglary, and acquitted; and on being arraigned for trial upon the second charge, he pleaded that he had been ac quitted of the charge of burglary, and quitted of the charge of burgiary, and was not guilty of the latter charge. To this plea a demurrer was interposed by the State, and sustained by the Supreme Court on appeal, whereupon the defendant was sentenced to two years in the Penitentiarry on the last charge. The following "report," by E. F. Ware, of the Fort Scott Bar, was witten at the time of the hear-

BTATEMENT OF CASE.
This defendant, while at large,
Was arrested on a charge
Of burglarious intent,
And direct to jail he went.
But he somehow felt missed,
And through prison walls he oor
And in some unheard of shape
He effected his escape.

Mark you, now: Again the law On estendant placed its paw, Like a hand of iron mail, And reacked him into jail— Which said jail, while socorraled, He by sockage-tenure hald.

Then the Court met, and they tried Lewis up and down each side, On the goed old fashioned plan; But the jury cleared the man. Now you think that this strange cas Ends at just about this place.

Lewis, tried for this last act, Makes a special plea of fact: "We roughy did they me arrest, As my trial did attest; And while rightfully at large, Taken on a wrongful charge,

I took back from them what they From me wrongfully took away."

When this special ples was heard, Thereupon the State demurred. The defendant then was pained

As a matter, sir, of fact, Who was injured by our act— And property or man? Point it out, sir, if you can. Can you selze us when at large On a baseless, trumped-up charge! And if we escape, then say It is a crime to getaway— When we rightfully regained What was wrongfully obtained?

Please the Court, sir, what is crime? What is right and what is wrong? Is our freedom but a song, Or the subject of a rhyme?

Now, if this knowledge of English is Now, if this knowledge of English is thus essential, why not teach it? Is it a prominent branch of education in our universities? Not at all; not in Harvard and Yale, I am sure; probably in no other. It is a humble attendant on other studies, counting almost as a supernumerary. There are professors of rhetoric and of English literature, but they are held in light esteem, I believe, by the other chairs of the faculty, and they are allowed to demand but little of the student's time. Their courses are made so easy that the idle seek them as "optionals." Only work executed in good style upon the shortest notice.

think of their being classed as optionals, when their proper result is essential! Oh, but the students are supposed to know English when they enter college. Are they? Ask the disqusted professors of rhetoric. He will tell you that in nine-tenths of the exercise committed to him spelling and grammar and construction are all at fault. And to correct this disgraceful ignorance there are six or eight "compositions" a year. There should be several times as many. In learning to write well there is but one secret of success, and that is frequent, laborious practice, coupled with assiduous correction. I venture to assert that the journeymen printers of our land write more fluently and grammatically, on the average, than the secretary of the secretary with the secretary of the secretary nd grammatically, on the average, than he seniors in our universities. Why? ot through superiority of intellect, certainly; not because they know Greek and Latin and mental philosophy, solely be-cause the handling of English is their daily work Obviously there must be more writing than there is in our schools and colleges, or we shall continue to lack President Eliot's essential to culture. Other studies

Eliot's essential to culture. Other studies must cede some ground to this one; and to that end there must be fewer enforced courses. Every one who knows the college youth knows that he is harrassed with many text books, and that he ends his four years with but a smattering of various branches of knowledge, having learned no thing thoroughly. He must have time for his compositions, or he cannot do them well. Norshould he be called on for much original thought—a frequent error of the professor of rhetoric. No profound or untsual subjects; only such as the student can write about readily; only topics within easy reach for one of his age and information; translations; sketches of personal adventure; renderings, in one sown words from well known. sopies within easy rean for one of his age and information; translations; sketches of personal adventure; renderings, in one's own words, from well known authors; epitomes of professional lectures; or of text books, even; replies to the effusions of brother students—such themes as these should be conceded. The object is to bring about much writing, much handling of the mother tongue, much of that practice which makes perfect. The professor of rhetoric should remember that other professors reveal metaphysics, the lessons of history, and the secrets of political economy, and that his business is strictly and exclusively to teach a fluent, correct, and graceful use of English. But if all this is done, other studies will be neglected. No doubt of it, and, of course, it is a pity; but still no doubt we must make a choice. Either a poor instruction in English and a smattering of many things, or a fairly good instruction in English and a smattering of fewer things—that is our dilemma. But is it worth while to make a nation of good writers? It has certainly been worth.

worth while to make a nation of good writers? It has certainly been worth while to have Greeks and Frenchmen; th world has judged that they deserved a great deal of attention. Morphine Under the Skin—Experience of a Victim of the Needle-nosed Syringe.

Indianapolis News.

"How did I ever cure myself of the opium habit?" said a man a little more than thirty years of age, to a News reporter this morning. "First, I'll tell you how I got in the way of using the drug. I don't use opium myself, mind you, but morphine, the active principle of opium. I took it hypodermically, under the skin, that is the merphine in solution was injected into my arm. You never have had inflammatory rheumatism, perhaps? Well, I have, and when a man has that, he'll jump at anything for relief. Five years ago I began the use of morphine by sub-cutaneous injection. I never used the little needle-nosed syringe myself, but the soothing fluid was always injected by my physician. At first it was given me two or three times a week under the skin of my arm, but it was no great while until the syringe came to be used that often each day, and I became a slave to the drug. I was gloomy, despondent, worthless, except when under the influence of the opiato, and when charged with it was guite as worthless, east expert when under the sind men of the syringe or and listessness that made me uterly averse to all exertion. My right arm (for that matter my left arm also) has been so closely punctured with holes from the syringe point that you couldn't lay a quarter down on my arm anywhere without touching two or three sore places, for the morphine inflamed the flesh wherever incision was made.

Cured of rheumatism, I had acquired in its stead the opium disease, opiophagy, which was infinitely worse. When I left this city to go to Hot Springs my physician advised me to take a solution of morphine along with me and hypodermic syringe. FERVENT WORDS.

A Good Woman's Testimony.

Under date of February 22d. 1878, Miss Sarah T. Smith writes from Liverpoot, Delaware county, Pa., to Colonel Dunbar, of Waukesha, Wis. This letter is before us. It bears the unmistakable evidence of culture and refinement, besides being pervaded with the writer's religious feelings and full belief that a Divine hand led her to try Bethesda Waier for her affliction, "Bright's Disease." We make some extracts. After detailing her intense suffering, Miss Smith tells of the arrival of the first gallon of Bethesda Water:

"It came, and I followed the directions, stopping all other medicines. In less than four hours the pain was gone. I slept well that night, and the next day left my room for the first time for four weeks."

The annuly of waterid and 1 hone gave cit. A Good Woman's Testimony that night, and the next day left my room for the first time for four weeks."

The supply of water (1 gal.) then gave out, and it was five days before the sufferer received a ten gallon keg. Meanwhile, "the pain had returned, and all the old misery. On Wodneeday night (Feb. 13), I suffered so that I was given $\frac{3}{2}$ of a grain of morphia (the most I ever took at one time), without effect. On Thursday I commenced drinking the water at $\frac{3}{2}$ A.M., and before noon was perfectly free from pain and have had no return of it.

The writer, in coediuson, says: "There is something peculiarly happy in the thought of being thus benefited directly by the hand of God."
